THE EFFECT OF FERE. 202. Ballistic Qualities Of The Rifle.--The ballistic qualities of an arm are indicated by its accuracy, flatness of trajectory, and disabling power. The accuracy of the United States rifle, caliber.30, model of 1903, is shown in the table of deviations in Description and Rules for the Management of the United States Rifle, Caliber.30, which exhibits the mean vertical and mean horizontal deviations expressed in inches for the various ranges from 100 yards to 2,000 yards, inclusive. The same publication exhibits in the Table of Ordinates and Table of Fire, the form of the single trajectory. The striking energy or disabling power of the arm is indicated in the table showing the penetration of the bullet at various distances in different materials and substances. The quality of flatness of trajectory is directly dependent upon the initial velocity and to some extent upon the form of the bullet, a given weight being assumed. Two rifles of different type may possess the same accuracy, that is to say, the same dispersion, at any given range; but if one of the rifles gives a trajectory more curved than the other, an error in the setting of the sight due to an erroneous estimate of the range will cause a greater displacement from the aiming point of the center of impact of the diagram of hits...
