A disproportionate number of physicians has been concentrated in urban areas, mainly because of professional considerations. During fiscal years 1972 to 1977, more than 430 million in federal funds were obligated in an attempt to increase the supply of physicians in shortage areas. Federal efforts have had some success, but many problems remain. The National Health Service Corps increased the availability of physicians in shortage areas but, because it has not adequately assessed needs, its physicians are underused in terms of patients served at some sites. The federal loan repayment program has attracted only a small percentage of eligible physicians, most of whom would have established practices in shortage areas anyway. The program for area health education centers has the long-term potential to improve health manpower distribution by meeting some of the professional considerations. The preceptorship program will probably not substantially affect location choices, but the family medicine training program has the potential for increasing the supply of physicians in rural areas and small towns because of the tendency for many family practitioners to locate in such areas. Many states and private organizations have attempted to increase access to primary care medical services in rural areas through programs using nonphysician providers, including nurses and physician extenders. The inability to receive reimbursement from medicare or other sources for physician extender services restricted more widespread use of such services. Recent authorization for such reimbursement may help areas to use physician extenders to meet health care needs. This item ships from La Vergne,TN. Paperback.
