Sometimes two or more teeth are extracted instead of one by the improper application of the instruments used, by which two are grasped. Whenever this occurs, however vexatious it may be, the patient can only submit to the loss of his tooth, for, as a general rule, no attempt must be made to replace it in its socket. This has been done and has, in some instances, especially in young persons, succeeded, but as its connexion with the system is entirely cut off, it rarely ever regains its former condition, but continues a source of more or less pain, or irritation, till it is again extracted. Sometimes, indeed, a tooth, replaced in this manner, gives rise to most frightful disorders of the mouth. CHAPTER VII. TARTAR. Supposed to be composfd of skeletons of animalcule--Consists of bone and animal matter--Similar formations found, sometimes, in various parts of the body--Held in solution by the saliva, from which it is deposited apin the teeth--At first soft but gradually increasing in hardness--Varieties of color and consistence--Its accumulation miy always be prevented--Its effects--Inflammation of the gums--Destruction of vitality in the teeth--Lungs liable to suffer--Digestion disturbed--Method of removing it--To be effectual it must be thoroughly done--Teeth much loosened, from this cause, do not, again, become firm--Use of acids for the removal of this substance highly injurious--Directions for preventing its re-accumulation after it is once removed.
